Titled Marriages. If it be true that Lord Randolph Churchill and his beautiful American wife find the bonds of matrimony so onerous that they will bear them no longer, it is the most forcible protest of the day against the marriage of American girls to foreigners of any nation simply because of their rank. It had been supposed that this was the one couple whose amicable relations were without cloud. The Anglomaniac American matron was wont to point to them, when taken to task touching her anxiety to engraft her ten-German barons, French counts, and Italian princes there were but three of the wives living with their titled husbands, the answer was that when we considered England it was different. There was Lady Harcourt, the daughter of the historian, Motley, who was still in the home of her lord and master, and Lady Chyndill. These two were cited. and Lady Churchill. These two were cited as models of the transplanted American women who flourished and grew apace on British soil. The truth about Lady Har court is very well known to few. She is no longer in her first youth, and long endurance has weakened her capacity to resist. So she bears her cross, for cross it is, and will to the end. Lady Churchill is of a different type. Extremely handsome, full of spirit and wit, she should have succeeded, if success be possible. She has done her duty to her husband as loyally as ever woman did it. During the canvass of last fall for his parliamentary seat Lady Churchill took a band so vigorously that it was a common saying among the voters of Paddington, which he represented, that "Lord Randy's American wife pulled him through,"

No American woman with a titled hus band was so well known on both sides of the ocean as was Lady Churchill. As Miss Jerome she was one of the belles of New York before her marriage, whose right to birthhood was undisputed. Those who knew her liked her as much for her goodness of heart and womanly worth as for her beauty. When twelve years ago her husband met and married her she became as great a favorite at Blenheim, the historic seat of the Duke of Marlborough, as she had been in New York. Her brother-in-law, the Marquis of Blandford, the eldest son of the Dake warlborough, treated be and spoke more respectfully of her than of any woman living except his mother. That fine old English gentleman, the Duke, her father-in-law, who was the living image of Mr. Reverdy Johnson, fairly doted on his son's pretty, bright, young American wife. Even the Queen, whose intensely British prejudice could never endure "foreigners," took to the American girl, who, so far from Wholesale and Retail Dealers in

A fall and complete stock of first pistels. home and all she had ever been accustomed inherited from the head of the house, John Churchill, must out in Randy. It is in them all," Well, it looks as though these Job's comforters are right in their prophecy. The black drop has come out in the present Duke, and with a vengence. He is fortytwo years old. Before he was thirty he had figured twice in the most disgraceful cases of seduction. At thirty he had ruined the wife of his bosom friend, poor Aylesford, who died a year or two ago far away from home and friends. His own wife he drove almost to desperation, until her friends would not permit him to kill her body and soul, and took her broken-hearted back to her childhood's home. This is the record of the head of the great house of Marlborough. The second son, it seems, is going the same way. With phenomenal advance-ment, for he is but eight and-thirty, until within the fortnight past, he was at the head of the most powerful bureau—so far as patronage goes—there is in the English Cabinet but one. And now he has fallen so low that his wife can no longer endure his repeated violations of the solemn oath he took before God, and will return to her childhcod's home. Her life is ruined, broken, and ended long before her time. The incident furnishes an awful warning. See Bennet and one of the young Vanderbilts have loaned him. And the story might be stretched to the crack of doom.

In 1844 a man by the name of Mortimer moved to Cherokee county, N. C., from Virginia. He was a wealthy man, owning a number of slaves, and said to be a good man. When the pistol was fired the ball took off the forefinger of her right hand head to wissing her tample. But head to be seen wissing her tample. hand, barely missing her temple. Both were married men and had families. Henry. Mortimer was arrested, tried and acquitted, his mother being the only witness in the case. And now comes the strangest part of this story—stranger than fiction. Henry Mortimer is a veritable modern Cain. He has not a hair on him from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet. We have seen and talked with him, and know whereof we speak. He is about six and a half feet high; very stout; converses splendidly, although somewhat reticent in his manner der bud upon some noble Britannic family tree. Whenever it was stated that out of thirty-one marriages of American misses to was between nine and ten o'clock, he was between nine and ten o'clock, he was the his deaf brother. He could see visited by his dead brother. He could see and bear him, but he himself could not move or speak. He lay as if dead, in a passive state. He had beautiful auburn hair and beard, which was his pride. His brother visited him the second time, and reached out his skeleton arm and bony fingers and commenced plucking his hair, one by one, from his head; then his eyebrows, eyelashes beard and so on, until he had plucked every hair off his entire body. It was not done in one night, but was kept up from night to night for about three months. He is a wanderer on the earth, and travels at night. He is the greatest curiosity we have ever seen. He has the supposed mark of Cain.—N. C. Bulletin.
